FATHOM FINANCIAL: What Chance Of A Fed Rate Cut?

LONDON (Dow Jones)--We argued in last week's column that while the S&P500 has had a good run, it could have done better given the decline in bond yields since the summer.

The reason may be that equity investors are becoming concerned that the factors underpinning the fall in bond yields, namely fears about a significant U.S. slowdown, may turn out to be well founded.

However we also argued that the bond market was in danger of ignoring two of its own cardinal rules: never fight the Fed and never assume the U.S. consumer has enough.

One week, a largely unchanged Fed statement, and a retail sales surge later, the bond market is indeed reassessing its earlier optimism on interest rates.

Nonetheless, while the market has scaled back its rate cut expectations somewhat, it continues to bet that the Fed will change its tack and cut rates early in 2007.

In an effort to quantify this pressure, we have constructed a model of Fed interest rate cuts. We look at the recent data flow, and try to gauge whether the economy is losing enough momentum to compel the Fed to step in with lower rates.

Our preferred specification (model and estimation details are available on request) includes the following variables: the real Fed funds rate; the three-month change in the unemployment rate; the change over the previous month in the production component of the manufacturing ISM; the average level of the production component of the manufacturing ISM over the previous three months; annual house price inflation (NAR series); and the University of Michigan survey of one-year ahead inflation expectations.

All explanatory variables are lagged by one month to represent, approximately, the information available to the Fed at the time each decision was made.

One of the more significant, if unsurprising results, is that interest rate cuts are serially correlated: a rate cut in the previous month significantly increases the chances of a rate during the current month. This is a crucial point to bear in mind when it comes to understanding where we are today.

Other salient features of the model include the fact that the real Fed funds rate is mean reverting: the higher the real Fed funds rate in the previous month, the more likely is a rate cut in the current month.

Core PCE inflation turns out not to be statistically significant, while the Michigan inflation expectations measure is. That indicates that Fed policy is forward rather than backward-looking.

And although we believe that the non-manufacturing ISM survey is a far more useful predictor of U.S. GDP growth than is its manufacturing counterpart, it is the latter that performs best as a guide to turning points.

Since 1978 there have been 10 major rate cutting episodes, by which we mean periods where interest rates are cut more than once before they are increased again.

The estimated probability of a rate cut tends to drift up in the months prior to the first cut in a cycle, and that the estimated probability rises substantially further after the first cut.

Its current reading, that there is a 21% chance of an interest rate cut this month, is relatively high, given that the last move in interest rates was upward. On average, interest rates have been cut just 8% of the time when the previous move in interest rates has been upward.

How do we square this result with the Fed's message that the next move in rates is still more likely to be upwards, indeed, with one FOMC member continuing to vote for higher rates?

Our model is a mechanical, data-driven tool. It tells us how often the Fed has cut rates in the past when confronted by the same set of data that they are faced with today.

Economists can be grateful that predicting Fed moves in practice requires a large degree of subjective analysis. Not least, it requires an assessment of Fed speeches, something that is missing from our model.

Perhaps the best way to interpret the results is the following thought experiment. What would it take, according to our model, to get to a 50% chance of a rate cut by March?

The answer, which could be viewed as markers for a rate cut, turns out to be some combination of the following: the unemployment rate continuing to drift up by 0.1 percentage point per month; the production component of the ISM falling to 40 from 48.5 by March; and the University of Michigan inflation expectations measure falling from its current level of 3% to 2.5%.

Each of these developments is clearly possible, but this week's retail sales surge is timely reminder that the markets have tried to second-guess this recovery almost from its birth, and have, so far, been consistently wrong.

FATHOM FINANCIAL: A B-Plus Grade For The Equity Rally

Dow Jones Capital Markets Report

CM

英文

(c) 2006 Dow Jones & Company, Inc.

By Danny Gabay

Of Fathom Financial Consulting

LONDON (Dow Jones)--Regular readers of this column will know that we have argued in favor of equities over bonds repeatedly since 2003. Excepting the odd month or even quarter, the strategy has worked.

For example, the S&P 500 index has risen by 65% from its trough in 2003, and by more than 11% since July. The index is now just 6.5% lower than its peak in 2000.

But if you were writing a school report, you would have to say that it had done well, but could have done better.

Given the decline in longer-dated bond yields this year, the S&P500 index should be some 250 points higher than it is today.

There is a valuation relationship between bond and equity prices, as we know. Using a standard dividend discount model, we can quantify that relationship.

Our calculations show that given the drop in the bond yield, or the risk-free rate, and holding everything else constant, the S&P 500 index should be some 17% higher than it is today.

Why isn't it?

There are two possible explanations. Either profits growth has been revised down, or the equity risk premium has risen over this period by around 0.5%, or some combination of the two.

Earnings remain robust, and, with the dollar falling, they should get a boost, at least in the short term.

The more likely explanation is that the equity risk premium - the excess over the risk free rate that investors require in order to hold equities as opposed to bonds - has risen. And the reason is the growing concern about the impact the housing market correction will have on the wider U.S. economy.

Ten-year Treasury yields are now lower than they were when the Federal Reserve began tightening policy in 2004.

When the Fed funds rate was at 1%, the 10-year rate stood at 4.6%. Four hundred and twenty five basis points of tightening later, it stands at 4.4%.

Alan Greenspan called the level of bond prices a conundrum. But the latest bond rally is relatively easy to explain.

Unlike previous episodes, this rally has been driven by the short end of the curve. The market is pricing in around 85 basis point of monetary easing next year.

Whether it is right to do so is an open question.

Official Fed rhetoric would suggest that it is not. The statement issued after the last FOMC meeting warned of the possible need for further tightening.

But a run of weak data has convinced the market that the Fed will be forced to change its focus from inflation to growth and jobs.

This elevates today's non-farm payrolls release back to the center of attention.

Investors will be looking for signs that the weakness in the housing market has translated into lost construction jobs.

If they do not see such evidence then rate cut expectations will be pared back. But ironically, that could be good news for stocks.

A DOW JONES NEWSWIRES COLUMN

Although polls point to potential for the biggest political shift in Congress in a dozen years, many investors aren't paying close attention.

Most believe that the near-term impact of Tuesday's elections on taxes, spending and other major policy items will be small. A much bigger market focus at the moment is the economy's performance and the question whether signs of ongoing strength mean the Federal Reserve hasn't finished raising interest rates in this cycle.

Indeed, moderate Democratic gains would be good news for investors, say market analysts. Such an outcome would bring a return of the 1990s-era when power was so evenly divided among the two major political parties that there was little scope for either to advance major initiatives.

"If (the balance of power) is split and Democrats don't have a big majority, you will get gridlock," says Quincy Krosby, chief investment strategist at The Hartford Financial Services Group in Hartford, Conn. "The markets are saying, 'Gridlock ain't' such a bad thing.'"

That's not to say that the election results couldn't spark some market volatility in the near term.

Two years ago, blue chip stocks tumbled on exit polls suggesting that Senator John Kerry (D-Mass.) was ahead in the closely contested presidential election. But stocks then rebounded and went on to post ample gains in later weeks, says Jerry Webman, chief economist and director of fixed income at Oppenheimer Funds in New York.

Any signs that Democratic gains will be much bigger than expected could prompt a negative market reaction, primarily on fears that tax cuts on stock dividends and capital gains won't be renewed before they are scheduled to expire in 2010, he says. But losses likely would be short as investors realize that many newer Democratic candidates for Congress are political moderates and that the President will continue to have effective veto power over proposals seen as unfavorable to investors.

Democrats need to make sizable gains, especially in the Senate, to alter the balance of power in Washington.

In the House of Representatives, Republicans hold 232 of the 435 seats up for re-election. That means Democrats need to win a net 15 seats to take control again for the first time since 1994. However, based on some independent analyst projections, the party could win between 20 and 30 seats.

Democratic prospects are more difficult in the Senate, where a third of 100 seats are up for grabs. Republicans hold 55 seats there and have been pouring money into tightly contested races that could make the difference in control.

But the Presidency will remain in Republican control in any case, and enacting legislation over a presidential veto requires a two-thirds vote in each house. Historically, according to the U.S. Senate Web site, Congress has overridden fewer than 10% of all presidential vetoes.

Market Attention Focused On Economic Fundamentals

Regardless of the outcome, there's no historical evidence to suggest that it makes much difference to markets whether Republicans or Democrats control Congress, analysts say.

"The conventional wisdom, that Democrats are bad for equity returns, simply isn't supported by the data," says Douglas Peta, market strategist at J. & W. Seligman, New York. "Since World War II, stocks have gone up pretty much without regard for which party controls Congress or the White House. There hasn't been any significant relationship between S&P500 returns and party control of Congress or the president and the party."

Currently, he adds, investors are mostly concerned about how much U.S. economic growth is slowing in response to two years of Federal Reserve rate hikes. "Everyone knows we are slowing, but we don't know yet how much or how long the period of slowing will last. That's really what equities and bonds are contending with at the moment," Peta says.

"The election is unlikely to impact the Treasuries market by more than a token amount," adds Jane Caron, chief economic strategist at Dwight Asset Management in Burlington, Vt. "A change in control, should it occur, is unlikely to result in any significant change in the size of the fiscal deficit during the next couple of years."

On Friday, both equities and bonds weakened in reaction to news that non-farm payrolls grew by 92,000 and that payroll growth estimates for previous months were revised higher by the Labor Department. The unemployment rate fell to 4.4% in October, its lowest since May 2001, from 4.6% in September and compared with forecasts of 4.6% for October.

Those and other recent signs of strength in the economy have prompted worries that the Fed's aim to tame inflation isn't accomplished. Meantime, the belief that the economy isn't at any risk of recession and that consumer spending will remain buoyant after energy prices have plummeted has rekindled an appetite for riskier fixed-income assets, such as emerging markets debt and U.S. junk bonds, investors say.

"Lower oil prices in general are another reason that you would expect a greater level of confidence out there among investors and consumers," says William Kohli, a senior fixed-income portfolio manager at Boston-based Putnam Investments. "It's something that would cause us to view potential for the U.S. growth numbers to continue to look pretty good, and eventually for the Fed to look at higher rates."

MARKET COMMENT: Zurich Stocks To Open Just Higher

Dow Jones International News

DJI

英文

(c) 2006 Dow Jones & Company, Inc.

0637 GMT [Dow Jones] SMI premarket trading points to a higher opening around 8625, reflecting a positive move from the S&P500 and the Nikkei after the Swiss market closed Thursday. The Philly Fed had an unexpected decline, but some components read positive for equities, especially hints of weaker inflation. An OPEC production cut was well flagged and not seen as overly negative. Syngenta 3Q sales are strong but in line, so shouldn't move the shares much. Should Nestle shares rebound from Thursday's losses, this could drive the index higher. Macroeconomic calendar is remarkably empty. (HJS)
