ETFs, Which Are Meant To Track Benchmarks, Increasingly Go Astray

Fresh troubles are emerging in a number of exchange-traded funds, shedding light on the ways the increasingly popular investment tools can trip up investors.

ETFs, which are essentially mutual funds that trade on exchanges like shares of stock, were designed to match the performances of various market benchmarks, such as the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index. They still occupy a relatively small corner of the investment universe, but they have blossomed in the past few years, thanks to their low fees and tax advantages, attracting an increasing number of individual investors.

In recent months, however, some ETFs have begun diverging widely from the performance of the benchmarks they are supposed to follow. At the same time, several newer ETFs with short track records are failing to match the hypothetical rates of return they would have achieved in previous years if they had existed then.

Victoria Bay Asset Management's U.S. Oil Fund, one of the fastest-growing ETFs of the past year, has fallen more than 15 percentage points behind the oil price it was designed to track. In another case, a Claymore Securities ETF structured to track oil saw its share price fall when oil prices rose -- and vice versa -- the opposite of what was intended. That kind of divergence can hurt shareholder returns.

Though the exact reason for the disparity isn't clear, the performance of these oil-related funds has been hurt by the run-up in oil futures, which has increased the sums they need to shell out each month to roll over their futures contracts.

Greg Drake, a Claymore Securities executive, says occurrences like these are expected occasionally in the funds, though "it's not what we desire."

An official at Alameda, Calif.-based Victoria Bay declined to comment.

Such issues are arising in only a small number of ETFs, but they may mark a crucial shift in an investment sector long known for its predictable performance. At a time when ETFs are establishing themselves as a staple in Americans' portfolios, investors may need to consider that some new funds are coming to market with new risks and the potential to deliver unexpected results.

In less than three years, assets under management in ETFs have roughly doubled to more than $450 billion. About 110 new ETFs have been launched so far this year, gaining quickly on the total of about 150 launched for all of last year. By contrast, only about 50 distinct new conventional mutual funds have launched in 2007.

Hoping to capture more investor money, ETF providers are creating funds that slice up the market in increasingly narrow and unusual ways. IndexIQ Inc., Rye Brook, N.Y., recently filed with regulators to launch a family of 20 ETFs aimed at individual investors, including the IndexIQ Customer Loyalty Leaders Large Cap Fund, which would track companies with strong customer loyalty.

Adam Patti, chief executive of IndexIQ, says that intangible assets such as consumer loyalty can add substantial value to a company. "These products are not specialized, but fully diversified" across different company sizes and investing styles, he says.

Along with their lower costs and tax advantages over regular mutual funds, ETFs owe much of their popularity to the fact that they offer more frequent updates of their holdings and are easier to buy and sell because they trade all day in public markets. Some of the newer products, however, are straying from these advantages.

One recurring problem: Some newer ETFs are diverging from their hypothetical rates of return. The indexes on which ETFs are based are routinely "back tested" to see how they would have performed in previous years. That back-tested data is then often used to market the funds to investors.

Back-tested data for the WisdomTree High-Yielding Equity Index shows average annual returns outperforming the Russell 1000 Value Index for several time periods, including by more than three percentage points for the 10-year period ending in March. However, from June 2006 through the end of March, the ETF based on the WisdomTree Index trailed the Russell 1000 Value Index by more than 0.50 percentage point.

Other ETFs issued by New York-based WisdomTree Investments and PowerShares Capital Management of Wheaton, Ill., have fallen behind their back-tested data in similar ways.

Sixteen of the 20 ETFs launched by WisdomTree last June were outperforming their benchmarks as of the end of last month. "WisdomTree was happy with that performance," says Luciano Siracusano, the firm's director of research. He adds that "short time periods are not indicative of longer market cycles." The company's Web site states that "no representation is being made that any investment will achieve performance similar to those shown." PowerShares offers similar disclaimers.

ETF advocates say new funds like these are an important investment tool because they often give small investors access to markets or strategies that traditionally have been tricky to invest in, ranging from gold, oil and other commodities to international real estate. That's partly why Victoria Bay's U.S. Oil Fund ranks among the most successful new ETFs, amassing more than $900 million in assets since its inception last April.

The oil fund is designed to track the movements of light, sweet crude oil, a type of investment generally considered too cumbersome and complex for most individual investors. The fund's portfolio includes crude-oil futures contracts and other oil-related securities. However, since its inception, shares of the fund have declined more than 25%, while the oil price it is supposed to follow has fallen just 10%.

Victory Bay portfolio manager John Hyland points to regulatory filings about the product that explain such potential discrepancies in returns. Among other issues, the filings state that because the fund invests in a broad array of sophisticated futures contracts and other instruments, it can stray from its benchmark.

Two oil-related funds from Claymore, based in Lisle, Ill., have seen particularly striking discrepancies. The two funds -- the Claymore MACROshares Oil Up Tradeable Shares and Claymore MACROshares Oil Down Tradeable Shares -- let investors bet on oil prices rising or falling, respectively. But in recent months, their shares have sometimes moved in reverse of what they're supposed to. One day earlier this month when the relevant price of oil increased seven cents a barrel, the "Up" ETF's price dropped 25 cents.

The two funds' shares also frequently close at big premiums or discounts to the value of their underlying holdings. On some days this month, for instance, shares in the "Up" fund were priced more than 8% above the value of its assets. The "Down" shares traded more than 9% below their asset value.

These discrepancies highlight how tough it can be to design ETFs and related products like these for narrow or esoteric investments. "You never know what to expect with a new product," says Claymore's Mr. Drake. Overall, he says, the funds' underlying value has done "a fabulous job, compared to the alternatives, in tracking the price of oil."

Another emerging issue relates to taxes. Holders of ETFs generally have been able to avoid the capital-gains taxes that often plague investors in conventional mutual funds. That's because a conventional mutual fund often has to sell some of its holdings when investors want to leave the fund; if those holdings have increased in value since they were purchased, it may have a capital gain. By contrast, ETF shares change hands in the market; the underlying securities don't have to be sold off when an investor wants to sell out.

These days, however, more ETFs are making capital-gains distributions. About 6% of ETFs paid out capital gains to investors last year, compared with 3% in 2005, according to fund researcher Morningstar Inc. Among them was ProShares Ultra QQQ, which paid holders the equivalent of about 6% of its share price in gains last year, and the ProShares Ultra S&P500, which paid about 4%. The two funds seek to double the daily returns of the Nasdaq 100 Index and the S&P 500, respectively. To do that they buy not only the stocks in those indexes, but also futures and other derivatives, seeking to magnify their returns.

ProShares says the two ETFs could be "less tax efficient than plain-vanilla ETFs" due to their investment strategy.

FATHOM FINANCIAL: The End Of The U.S. Productivity Miracle

Dow Jones Capital Markets Report

LONDON (Dow Jones)--According to Paul Krugman, noted U.S. economist, productivity isn't everything, but it is just about everything.

Faster productivity growth is the economic elixir - the secret to faster economic growth without pain, or rather inflation.

Over the past decade, faster U.S. productivity growth has underpinned its so-called new economy, the lynchpin of which is the belief that rapid and deep absorption of the power of information technology has unlocked and enhanced America's growth potential.

Former Fed Chairman Alan Greenspan is widely credited with having been among the first to spot the potential of technology to raise U.S. productivity growth. At the very least, his willingness to allow monetary policy to explore the limits of this new paradigm is a significant part of his positive legacy as Fed chairman.

Greenspan's abiding view was and no doubt still is that the U.S. has only just begun to scratch the surface of what the information technology revolution could deliver.

Permanently faster productivity growth offers the tantalizing prospect of permanently higher profits and returns. Hence, belief in the new economy in turn has underpinned demand for U.S. assets from Treasury bonds to equities and, ultimately, the dollar itself.

But is it now all over?

Last year, U.S. productivity growth slowed to just 1.6% over the previous year. That was the weakest outturn since 1996, the year the new productivity trend was supposed to have begun, and is well below the 2.5% rate that has been in place since then.

The key question is, does this represent a change in the trend or simply a cyclical slowdown? Some slowing in productivity growth is a normal part of the business cycle. As any cycle starts, businesses will be wary of the resilience of the newfound demand and will thus tend to try and meet that demand by sweating their existing assets, rather than hiring new workers or installing new plant and machinery.

Hence, many cycles begin with the epithet of being "jobless." But this is a normal occurrence.

As the cycle matures, businesses find that they have exhausted their capacity to meet new demand and eventually they begin to hire and invest. As productivity is generally defined as output per head, more heads generally means lower productivity growth, but this isn't necessarily a bad thing, just a new phase of the business cycle.

To a great extent, that is what has happened in the U.S. Back in 2002, the first year of the current cycle, although growth in gross domestic product rebounded, employment fell by 1% over the previous year. Output per head consequently surged by over 4%.

Last year, payrolls expanded by nearly 2% over the previous year, and although GDP growth remained healthy, it didn't accelerate enough to offset the swing in employment. Consequently, per-capita growth slowed.

So far so good. But the more troubling point is that GDP growth did actually accelerate slightly in 2006. And profits remain in rude good health.

Which suggests that there may be something else besides the cycle dragging productivity growth down.

Labor productivity or output per head is influenced by a number of different factors, many of which have little or nothing to do with the quantity of effort supplied by workers.

In fact, the most important influences boil down to the capital-labor ratio, and something mysteriously called total factor productivity, or TFP. This catchall term is also known as the Solow Residual, named after the economist Robert Solow, and the rate of technological advance.

As ever with economics, it is this term that often does most of the work and it is this term that cannot be directly observed or measured.

Typically, TFP is derived as a residual, making it something of a black box. But understanding the determinants of TFP is crucial if we are to make judgments about potential growth going forward.

Broadly speaking, there are two main influences on TFP: genuine innovations or improvements in the production process; and the extent to which factors of production (labor and capital) are being used to their full potential.

The first influence can be thought of as the trend component - come what may, economies tend to grow, driven by a more or less autonomous process of innovation.

In a recent paper published by the New York Fed, Dale Jorgenson et al. use a more sophisticated production function to try and estimate the contribution of IT to labor productivity growth. Hence they split the capital stock into an IT and a non-IT capital stock; and similarly for production of goods and services. This allows them to distinguish between IT and non-IT TFP.

They find that the outlook for potential productivity growth remains optimistic with a base-case estimate for the next decade of 2.5 percent per year - in line with recent experience.

But there is a potential sting in the tail. They also acknowledge that "the role of IT (has) declined in relative importance after the dot-com crash of 2000."

In other words, the trend remains the same even if its main underpinning factor is no longer the same. That is not to say that IT is no longer exerting an upward influence on productivity growth, but just that other, non-IT, factors are now expected to do more of the heavy lifting.

The suspicion is that the new economy may be turning out to be less permanent than hoped. That it represented a shift to a new level rather than a permanently higher growth rate.

The authors also offer an optimistic scenario in which the trend actually accelerates towards 3%; and a pessimistic case in which it slows to 1.4%.

Last year's outturn was 1.6%. If this were to turn out to be the norm rather than the exception, the implications would be wide and far-reaching.

As noted above, the belief in the U.S.'s new economy, which hitherto has been based on a belief that the U.S. has a comparative advantage in the development and adoption of new technologies, has underpinned demand for U.S. assets, including the dollar.

As an example of the kind of impact a new, slower, productivity trend might have, we can look at the familiar dividend discount model for valuing equities.

In this basic model, the "fair value" of an equity market is a function of the expected growth in real earnings/profits, which is a function of the economy's trend rate of growth, and the equity risk premium.

Holding the latter constant for this exercise, we can see that if real earnings grow at 3% per annum, with an equity risk premium of around 3%, the faire value for the S&P500 would be 1387.

But holding everything else constant and changing the real earnings assumption to 2% per annum brings the fair value estimate down to 1008.

Were this to transpire, the recent market volatility will seem like a walk in the park.

Mar 15, 2007 (DJCS via Comtex) --

2108 GMT [Dow Jones] Asian markets are likely to again find support from U.S. equities, which rose for 2nd consecutive day with financials helping to boost S&P500, say Brown Brothers Harriman currency strategists; "favorable earnings reports from several houses boosted confidence that the sub prime lending concerns would impact profits." Notes VIX index, commonly used as indicator of risk-aversion, slipped toward 16.40 after climbing to 21.25 - its highest level this year. In Wall Street, Dow closed +0.2%, Nasdaq +0.3%. (SHN)
